WEATHER SYNOPSIS BY REGION

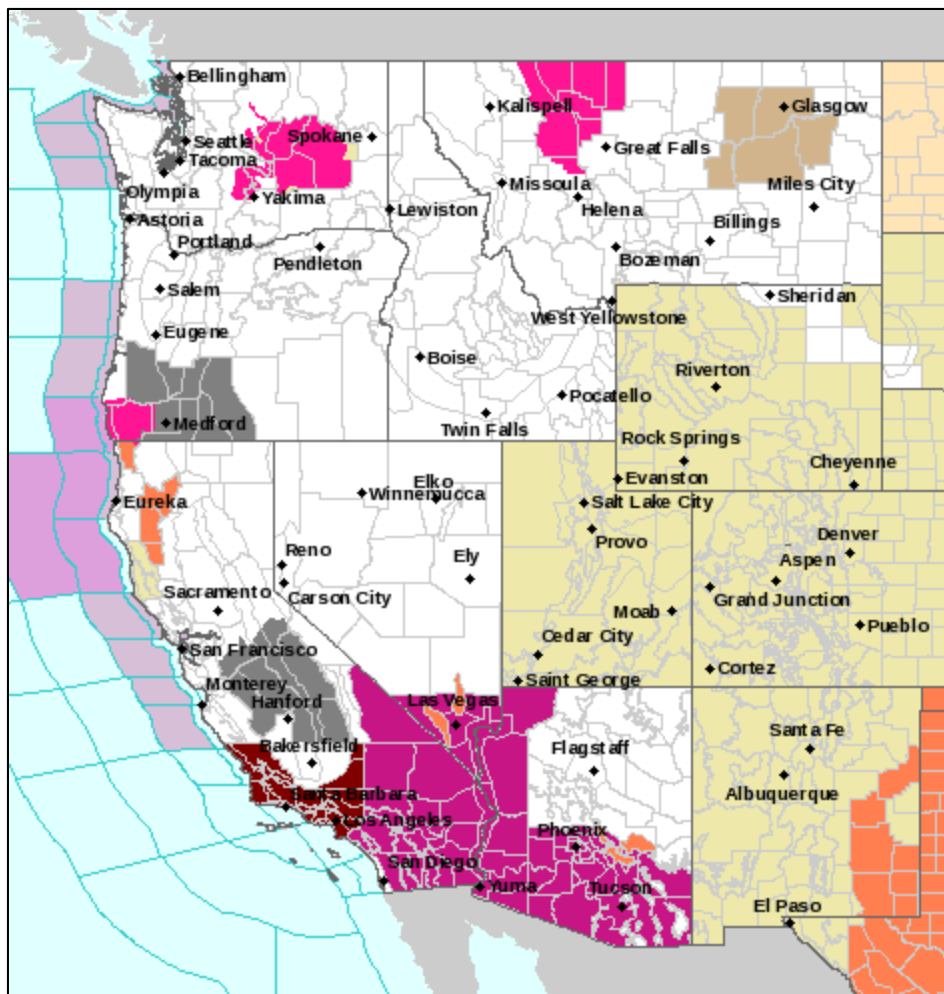

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA

Weather models are starting to converge a bit more for increased thunderstorm coverage across portions of the region during the weekend. Thus, have decided to High Risk the mountain and Far Eastside as a result. As is the case with these types of Monsoon Surge events, coverage patterns and storm wetness will get fine tuned as we get nearer to the event but there is enough evidence to support the High Risk. The threat for isolated thunderstorms will remain today and tonight as the moisture flow moves northward, especially favoring the coastal range within the Mid Coast-Mendocino as well as the Northern Sierra and Far Eastside. The initial activity looks to be drier for most of the area except for perhaps the Tahoe Basin. Monsoon moisture will settle over the area during the weekend with the High Pressure back over the Four Corners and a deepening low off the coast. Storm coverage should increase then although storm wetness will also increase with a mixture of wet-dry or smaller footprints of wetting rain. Larger footprints of wetting rain could potentially be found across eastern portions of the area but decided to throw those in the High Risk due to the amount of potential lightning. Residual lightning impacts (isolated) should remain Monday into Monday night before a drying pattern begins. Hot temperatures will remain the next 7 days although the added cloud cover and Monsoon Moisture push will take the edge of the afternoon heat. Strongest gusts near term will be found across the NW corner (gust to 20-25 mph) as well as throughout the greater Bay Area during the late afternoons and overnights. Gusty wind and low relative humidity (RH) will align across portions of Del Norte and Siskiyou counties the next 48 to 72 but the areal coverage is small so not High Risk. Humidity values will gradually trend up.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

Monsoonal flow is ebbing and this will result in fewer showers and thunderstorms over the next two days. Most of the storms will occur on desert-facing slopes of the Angeles, San Bernardino and Cleveland National Forest as well as the Sierras. Brief heavy rain will be possible from the storms as they move northwest at 10-15 mph. The central part of the state will see a modest cooling trend through today due to a trough over the Pacific Northwest. Highs will range from the upper 90s in the interior valleys and the San Joaquin Valley to 108 in the low desert. Minimum RH will be above 25% except across the central coast interior where some locations will see readings in the teens today. This weekend, high pressure will begin to build directly overhead, leading to warmer, less humid weather. Temperatures will be close to 100 degrees across interior valleys of Southern California, 103-105 in the San Joaquin Valley to 115 in the low desert. Isolated afternoon thunderstorms will still be possible near the Sierra Crest, but they will be short-lived and anchored to the highest terrain. Expect further warming next week as this ridge strengthens. By Tuesday and Wednesday, highs will be up to 108-110 in the valleys with daytime RH falling close to the single digits each afternoon. It will remain very warm through the end of the month, but winds should remain light throughout the extended period.
